PORTLAND, OR (KPTV) -

At least two people who got sick after eating at a popular Portland restaurant tested positive for norovirus.

State health experts said more than two dozen people became ill after dining at Andina around March 1 or March 2.

Some Andina employees were out sick the first week in March, but none who worked those days reported symptoms consistent with the virus.

Norovirus is highly contagious and comes from contaminated food, water, utensils or a food handler.

Andina's manager has not yet returned calls from KPTV for comment.
